Today I took a public presentation about self motivation on ted-x presented by young speaker Brendan Clark. The main purpose of his talk was self motivation , how motivation can help us achieve our goal. Clark delivered the concept very briefly and it was really easy for everyone to get the main topic of his speech. He gave examples from his daily life how he motivates himself towards his responsibilities , he said motivation differ for different people for example if anyone is a sportsman he has different motivation which always push him towards his goal. Similarly if someone is an actor he has his own motivation but no one can archive anything without motivation. He used statistics as well which were not surprising according to his speech and I was not surprised at all. The overall presentation was brilliant and everything was crystal clear but his facial expression and eye contact with the Audience was not satisfactory, his body language was not effective which made the presentation a little bit boring and I lost my attention during the presentation. So his body language was a barrier in his effective communication.
